

and my son thoroughly enjoyed Tony Cooper's story session, the one that Solveg and Tove attended.

From past experience I know for sure that it is right and sensible to take the colleagues I am working with into my confidence and to be open about the situation as I see it, feel it and hear it, remembering all all the time that my map of the situation may not be yours.

1. When you have finished this letter I would be grateful if, as a group, we had a look at the various messes you have lived through in this room on Monday and Tuesday, and also the good things.

2. Secondly, it would be useful to discuss times when you have broken through your teacher mask and have felt the need to come clean with people you work with professionally. It might be a big thing, like teaching badly, or it might be a small thing like not being able to answer a language information question.....

Yours (partly relieved + some apprehension [have I opened Pandora's box?])

Mario.
