

Dear Creative Teachers,

By the time you get this letter several things will have happened: we will have sorted into two groups we will have some idea of which names in the group we find easy to remember we will have experienced each other's presences through the mirroring exercises we have just done. You may have begun to wonder what sort of zoo you have elected to spend two weeks in! Yet these exercises help us to really come together fast; the information we get from them is below the threshold of awareness and works when we sleep.

I find it very useful to have the written channel open to me in communicating with you. I always write to language students too. If you feel like replying I shall be delighted to hear from you.

This morning at breaktime I would like to work with two of you to find out more about you and to find what you hope to get from the course. During this 30 minute session we will work entirely on what is uppermost in your minds., not mine. I'd like to work with another two people in the first half hour of the lunch break, 12.30 - 1.00.

It is one way of trying to individualise the course more.

I am looking forward to our short ten days together. In Greek you say "all beginnings are hard". I disagree with this mind set. For me "all beginnings are full of wondrous potential".

Yours warmly,

Mario
